

Tsumago-juku

Kumagai Family House
Part of a row-house built in the early 19th century. Other parts were demolished and remodeled. (Town's designated treasure)

Trace of Kuehidome Inspection Station
Here was an inspection station from the late 15th century, and it was integrated into a bigger one in Kiso Fukushima.

Kosatsu-ba
This was an "official bulletin board," refurbished to reproduce the way it looked in the Edo era. The Bakufu government announced laws and rules here. Kosatsu or high-rise tablets are posted high as if looking down on common people.

Tsumago-juku Honjin (Nagiso-machi museum)
This building was reproduced in April, 1995. Shimazaki Family was designated as Honjin when the post town system was established, and had been serving as Honjin and the village headman until the Meiji Restoration. Toson Shimazaki's mother was born in this family. Toson Shimazaki was a famous novelist in the Meiji era. His brother was adopted to head this family.

Gimmokusei or Osmanthus Fragrans
This tree has been kept by the Yazaki Family, the oracle, for generations. It blooms from mid-September to early October (prefectural natural monument).

Kotoku-ji Temple
This temple is believed to be built in 1500. As if looking down on the town, this graceful temple is surrounded by white walls on a hill.

Enmei-jizo (sweating jizo)
Life-lengthening stone statue. The head monk, Chuga-oshou of Kotoku-ji Temple found, along the Araragi River, a stone on which an image of a deity emerged, and carried it here and enshrined it in 1813.

Street of Terashita
The preservation of Tsumago-juku is unique as people preserve the town, while they lead normal daily lives. Terashita is the place where historic preservation movement began first, and the street preserves the old townscape very well, which deserves the name "the origin of preservation movement."

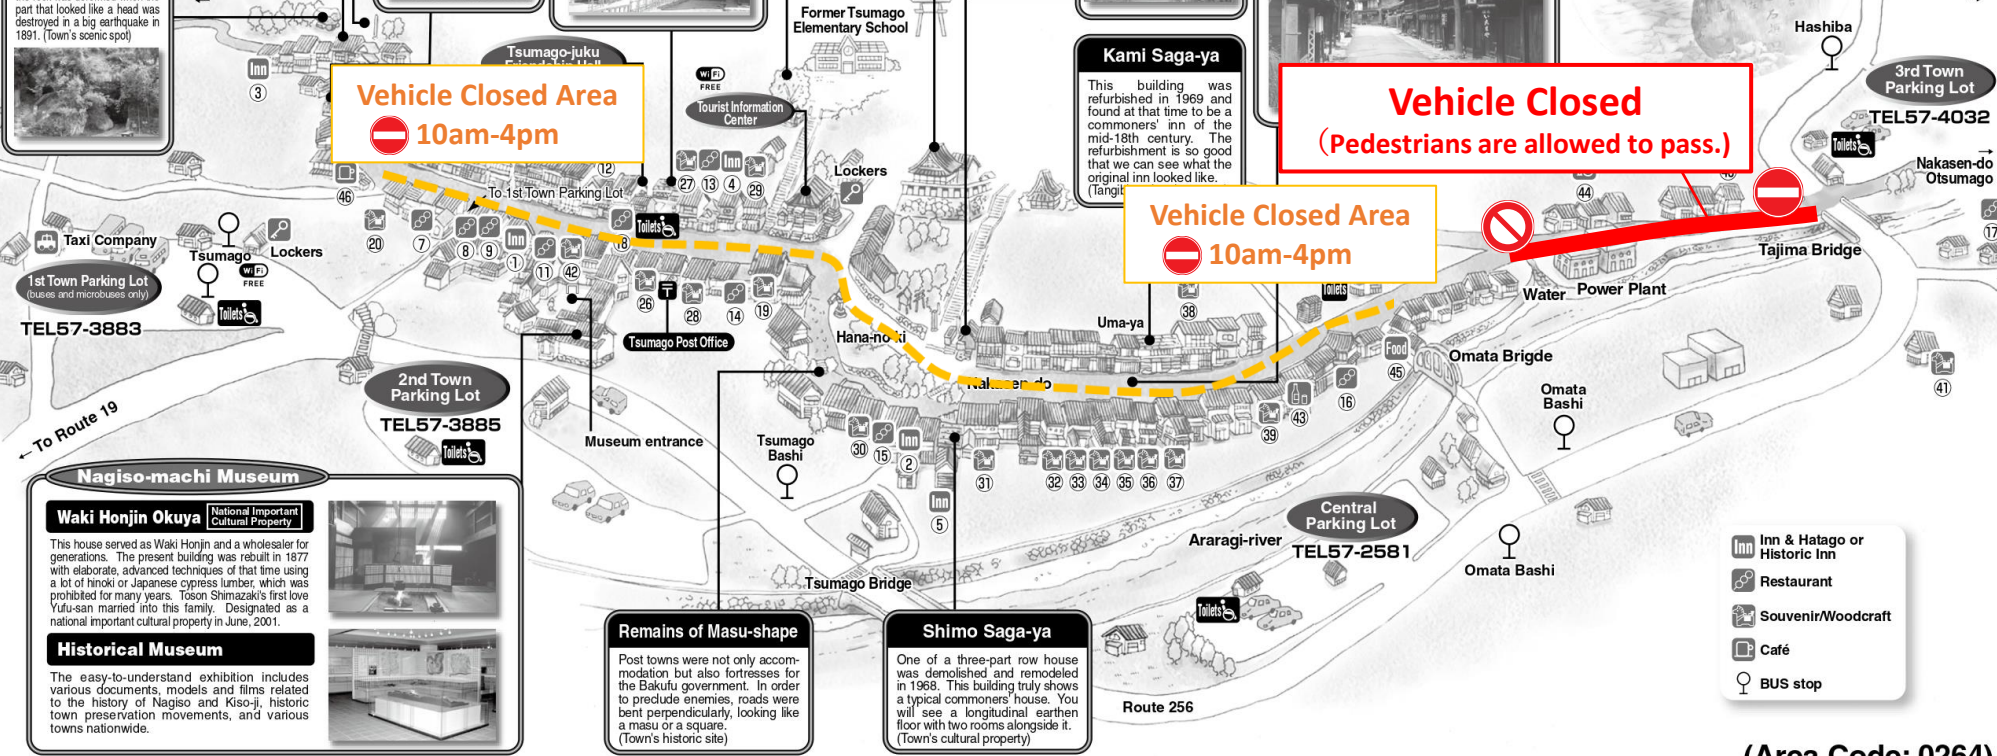

Koi Iwa or Carp Stone
This was one of the three famous rocks of the Nakasen-do Road and looked like a carp. However, the rock was deformed when the part that looked like a head was destroyed in a big earthquake in 1891. (Town's scenic spot)

Nagiso-machi Museum

Waki Honjin Okuya National Important Cultural Property
This house served as Waki Honjin and a wholesaler for generations. The present building was rebuilt in 1877 with elaborate, advanced techniques of that time using a lot of hinoki or Japanese cypress lumber, which was prohibited for many years. Toson Shimazaki's first love Yufu-san married into this family. Designated as a national important cultural property in June, 2001.

Historical Museum
The easy-to-understand exhibition includes various documents, models and films related to the history of Nagiso and Kiso-ji, historic town preservation movements, and various towns nationwide.
